Political candidates and commentators who are now active for “Trumpism without Trump” might want to recall some Twentieth-Century history:

After Adolph Hitler took office and consolidated his power, his first major mass killing was not against his open enemies, but against the members of his own Nazi party whose loyalty he doubted. If Donald Trump is returned to the Presidency, who can say that he might not follow his role model in this, as in other things? Doesn't his usual rhetoric regularly promise vengeance against all who oppose or displease him? Who will he turn on first?

Perhaps our new governor, and our continuing representatives in the House and Senate, are wise to leave no doubt about their sole (soul?) allegiance to Trump.
